HOURS AT HOME. Edited by J. M. Sherwood. Janua-

The first article in this number discusses Dr. Draper's work on the "Future Civil Polity of America," which the writer believes will not increase the reputation of the author as a philosophical expounder of the causes and course of human history. He finds fault with the haste and episodical character of the composition, and the want of compactness and conclusive force in the argument. Dr Draper he maintains is more at home in whatever concerns the natural sciences, especially physiology, than in the questions which relate to Keenan Henly, Robinson, Stacon, in historical suggestions and practical inferences, anney Brinkiera, Brady, Hough-en, Smith, O'Callaghan, Ressell, by Mr. H. The "Hours at Home" appears to be established on a permanent basis, and has handsomely fulfilled the promises of its founders. It is distinguished for the substantial and instructive character of its contents, rather than aiming to dazzle by excess of brilliancy, its accordance with the prevailing religious opinions of the "orthodox" portion of the community, and the temperance, fairness, and modesty of its critical judgments. As a magazine for the family and fireside, it meets a widely extended want, and can scarcely subject its readers to the possibility of a disappoinment in its perusal.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, JANUARY, 1808. Tickness The " Passages from Hawthorne's Note-Books," with which this number opens, are of very curious literary and psychological interest, revealing the inner workings of the author's mind, and the subtle processes by which the germ of a poetical suggestion was ripened into the materials for his weird power of fancy and construction. They were originally jotted down in his diary, as they occurred after the excitement of outward scenes and incidents, or in the course of his solitary reflections, olely for private use, and with no forethought of their ever meeting the eye of the public. Everywhere they show the habit of minute and delicate observation, a keen sense of the mystic significance of nature, and a passion for tracing unexpected analogies among common events. They admit the spectator behind the curtain during the arrangement of his wonderful dramatic exhibitions, revealing the inception and growth of the magic combinations which have placed such a powerful spell on the hearts of his readers. In spite of his lonely ways and capricious moods, Hawthorne was always alert and active in his mental habits; no strange phase of nature or character cluded his grasp; and even the commonest incidents evoked beautiful and wondrous shapes from his plastic fancy. The colt in the pasture, pigs at their trough, been companions in the bar-room, fat and jolly militia ofthe progress and destiny of the race. Although he ficers, shy and blushing country girls by the wayhas a sharp word occasionally about the ignorance suggested pictures to his imagination, which were has a sharp word occasionary about the ignorance and ineapacity of metaphysicians and theologians, his own work is more uncertain in its logic and defective in its stricture than almost any treatize of the divines from Thomas Aquinas to Horace Bushnell.—
